

Acknowledgements

Many individuals and institutions have helped in the development, writing, and production of this book.

I have greatly benefited from the wisdom of the late Kathleen Tillotson, most dedicated and inspiring of scholars, whose encouragement at an early stage of my project cannot be forgotten. Special thanks are due to the staff of Cambridge University Library and of the British Library, who have done their best over many years to assist me in my research work. I am indebted to Oxford University Press for the permission to quote from their editions of the novels and letters of Charles Dickens. Not only in this respect, I have to thank Henry Widdowson for his guidance and advice.

I gratefully acknowledge a financial contribution received from the Austrian Federal Ministry of Education, Science and Culture. I am equally indebted to the Austrian Academy of Sciences, which accepted my study for publication and lost no time in bringing it out.

Finally, and most emphatically, I wish to express my gratitude to several friends and colleagues without whose help the book would never have reached its final form: Jonathan Sharp, who read the manuscript most carefully and improved its style. Hermann Blume, who did a great deal of editorial work on the text, which in his hands became a book. And Susanne Reichl, whose deep concern, constructive criticism, and generous assistance did far more than a word of thanks can ever acknowledge.
