The present book is a revision, and partly a rewrite, of my PhD thesis (“Doktorarbeit”, McAllister 2011). Like this earlier work, it is heavily indebted to the kindness and intellectual assistance of many people.

The deepest debt I doubtlessly owe to Helmut Krasser, my teacher and friend, who supported my work on this topic until his death in 2014. Without his calm guidance and friendly support it would have been impossible for me to arrive even at a first acceptable version of this study; and many of the changes made here derive from his advice and reflections. But more influential than any single idea or statement was his exemplary joy, nurtured by his irreverent intellect, in discovering the history of Buddhist philosophy throughout arduous philological excavations. I regret that we never had a chance to debate those parts of this revised work where I depart somewhat from the views of his cherished Dharmottara and move closer to those of Prajñākaragupta, an author that he did indeed warn me about.

This book would also not have been possible without Parimal Patil. Apart from his numerous publications on Ratnakīrti and Jñānaśrīmitra, I am very grateful to him for taking the time, and having the patience, to read through Ratnakīrti’s Citrādvaitaparakāśavāda with me, a text that supplies much of the epistemological foundation to what is maintained in the Apohasiddhi.

I would also like to thank the staff at the Asiatic Society of Kolkata, especially in the Manuscript Department, who helped me to consult a manuscript of the Apohasiddhi and provided photos of it to me. I am grateful also to Sanjit Kumar Sadhukhan who not only discussed parts of Bhaṭṭa Jayanta’s Nyāyamañjarī with me, but also made a great effort, sadly unrewarded, to locate the elusive sixth manuscript of the Apoḥasiddhi.

Many friends and colleagues deserve special thanks, and this short list will be incomplete: Martin Mucha, who read the translation of the Apoḥasiddhi with me, scrutinizing it like any philosophical text he applies his mind to; Markus Viehbeck, who helped me greatly with all Tibetological matters; Birgit Kellner, who made it possible for me to study Prajñākaragupta and to find the time to complete my revisions of this book; Masamichi Sakai, who freely shared his insights into the momentariness of everything with me and kindly summarized any Japanese secondary literature that I was curious about; Hisataka Ishida, who helped me find rare books; Toshikazu Watanabe, who saved me from several bad misunderstandings of Śāntarakṣita; and Karin Preisendanz, who offered her kind support for my search of manuscripts in and around Kolkata.

I would also like to thank the two anonymous reviewers of this book whose careful reading of the whole manuscript and helpful suggestions led to many corrections and improvements.

Needless to say, I alone am responsible for all the errors still present in this book.
